Trees of Life II follows Zenith's 2008 show of the same name, and the concept stems from director Margery Goldberg's longtime interest in and reverence for trees. A wood sculptor, conservationist and Washington resident, she says, "It seems only fitting that we celebrate our remarkable milestone with a show about trees, which symbolize life, friendship, evolution and endurance. Not to mention Washington, DC's status as the tree capital of the United States, made so by the sheer number and variety of trees given to our city by other countries and states."

For Goldberg, the Trees of Life exhibition also serves as a metaphor for the deep roots Zenith has established in Washington, DC, extending out to artists and collectors across America. "For the artists", she adds, "the tree theme can spark imagery on many levels; trees provide the air we breathe, the shelter we live in, the heat that warms us, the fruit that feeds us, the beauty that surrounds us and a place in the shade to relax with those we care about."

American Forests has been an influential voice for conservation and the environment since its founding in 1875. Today the nation's oldest nonprofit conservation organization works with individuals, communities, and policy makers to protect and restore forest ecosystems. American Forests' Global ReLeaf campaign has planted more than 30 million trees in 600 forest restoration projects worldwide in its first 20 years and has a new goal to plant 100 million trees by 2020.
